

HOW IT WORKS: The above drawing shows how the "thin-line" defense would work against a limited attack, such as China might launch, as opposed to a saturation attack from the Soviet Union. U.S. Spartan antimissile missiles would intercept attacking missiles at a first line of defense 400 miles, and at a secondary line 50 miles, from the target. The radar installations shown on the drawing are visualizations. Their exact locations are secret.